

Carl Kaysen To Succeed Oppenheimer

The next director of the Institute for Advanced Study will be an economist and Harvard professor who has served as a White House adviser on national security affairs.

He is Carl Kaysen, 45, who will succeed Robert Oppenheimer, retiring in June from the post he has held since 1947.

In 1961, Kaysen was enlisted by the Kennedy Administration and came to Washington to work with his friend, Presidential Assistant McGeorge Bundy. The following year he was appointed Deputy Special Assistant for National Security Affairs. He was involved in preliminary work on the nuclear test-ban treaty and went to Moscow for negotiations and signing of the treaty.

Kaysen returned to Harvard in 1963 to his post as associate dean of the Graduate School of Public Administration. He has continued as a special consultant to the President, serving on the President's disarmament committee last year and heading the task force on foreign economic policy in 1964.

Kaysen will be the fourth director of the Princeton, N.J., Institute since its founding in 1930. His appointment was announced yesterday by Samuel D. Leidesdorf, chairman of the board of trustees.

"No one can deny the difficulty of finding a successor to a director of such eminence and impressive achievements as Dr. Oppenheimer," Leidesdorf said. "But we feel certain that in Dr. Kaysen we have found a man entirely worthy of this challenging and adventurous job."

Kaysen is expected to continue his own scholarly work. He is the author of "United States v. United Shoe Manufacturing Corporation, an Economic Analysis of an Anti-Trust Case," and co-author of three other books.
